Linux Commands

Output Piping and Redirects

The bash shell has two features called “output piping” and “output redirects.”

`ls | grep bash`

ls > list

This command will redirect output to a plain text file named list. If we do not have the file, then it will be created on a spot in the current working directory.

ls >> listfile

This variation of the command will append the output from the ls command to the list file, keeping any data from being overwritten.
